I just downloaded this app a few hours ago and initially I wasn't thinking of using it (but another app) for my kindle book I am going to publish soon but now I am so impressed due to what I saw and will use this app! The photos it let me create are so beautiful!!! Thank you so much! A few things I would like you to do for me is, please make your app to stop freezing or hanging (for it does sometimes when you click undo or redo) and secondly, please add more stickers especially humans and babies, and more please and thank you once again for I love your app!!! I was given the opportunity to draw even a three inch straight line before the app was for a rating and re rev. I ignored the first three that popped up, seemingly every 60 seconds (Yep, sounds about right), but I finally chose to no longer ignore the pestering and rate/review this app. Maybe you developers feel if I rat this app before I've had the chance to truly delve into the functionality and possibly user friendliness of it, my review may be a little less harsh. I've not had a chance to know if I like the app, I just know I don't like being pestered. That's the reason I've given the two-star rating. I like how you can express your artistic ability on a electronic and all but there are many things needed to be fixed. For example, when ever I go to remove things I press the undo button. But it takes like 3 minutes for the undo button to do its job (to undo). Another example is, ever time I want to make a clean page, I would press the clear button. But every time I pressed that button, there would always be and ad. I don't have the money to stop playing ads so it gets annoying sometimes. These are the only reasons the game is okay. Besides those, the game is a fun and saves a lot of space for when I go on vacations. ~It's okay The developer, Zobayed Ullah, indicated that the app's privacy practices may include handling of data as described below. Spotting a rat in your home or building can be unnerving.. One thing is certain, you don't want them to stick around. But in order to tackle your rat, you need to learn about your adversary to help you determine the best course of action. Understanding Rats If you're trying to identify a rodent in your home, remember that rats are much larger than mice. Their heads are large compared to their bodies. Rats have relatively small ears and their scaly tails are as long as their bodies. While mice have a light coating of fur on their tails, rat tails are hairless. An interesting fact about rats is that they are prolific breeders and, under the right circumstances, females can give birth to up to 10 pups approximately every three weeks. These pups are able to reproduce at between three or four months of age, allowing a rat population to quickly grow their ranks. Rat Behavior Did you know that rat's teeth never stop growing? Their constant gnawing and chewing as they feed and build their nests helps to keep their teeth from becoming overgrown. A rat's natural diet consists mainly of nuts, fruits, seeds, insects, and smaller animals, however they'll happily consume food intended for people and pets, as well. Do rats bite people? Although they generally try to avoid people, rats can become quite aggressive and dangerous if cornered, attacking out of fear. While many instances of rate bites are harmless, there is a chance the rat could infect a person with rat-bite fever. While rat-bite fever can be transmitted through a bite, as its name implies, a person can also become infected with this disease as a result of eating food or drinking water that has been contaminated by rats. If untreated, rat-bite fever can have serious, and potentially deadly consequences. Where do rats live? Rats are highly adaptable and can live just about anywhere they find enough food, water, and adequate shelter. Some rats, particularly the Norway rat, often live in underground burrows. These burrows, or rat holes, can be found alongside the foundations of homes, basements, or in untended areas beneath garbage or woodpiles. The entrance to a rat hole is roughly two to four inches wide -- wide enough for rats to squeeze through. Inside rat holes are tunnels that these creatures use to get around. However, since rats are also excellent climbers, they can nest inside homes and structures. Their cozy nests are ideal for raising vulnerable young year-round. Rat nests, unlike rat holes, are built aboveground and can be found in overgrown areas, trees, attics, or even inside hollow ceilings and cabinets. What types of rats live in the U.S.? While the U.S. is home to several species of rats of all sizes, there are some that are more common and pose more of a threat than others. Norway Rats Also called the brown rat, street rat, or sewer rat, Norway rats are common pests. Norway rats grow to a body length of 10 to 12 inches and rarely weigh more than a pound. Their fur ranges in color from grey to black to brown and have bulky bodies, blunt noses, and a long, hairless tail. The Norway rat is known for its habit of gnawing, which causes serious damage. The pathogens found in rat feces and urine can lead to severe illness and disease in humans. Roof Rats The reason these rodents are called roof rats is because they prefer to nest in high-up places like rooftops, trees, and attics. They're slightly smaller than their cousin, the Norway rat, and their fur is generally darker. In search of food, water, and shelter, roof rats will gnaw their way into homes, garages, and other structures. The risk of contamination through contact with rat feces and urine is high, and you can become very ill. Signs of a rat infestation The sight of a fast-moving, small, brown critter darting across the room can be a jarring experience. But, how can you tell if there's a mouse in the house or if you've got a rat problem? There are a few things that can help you better distinguish a rat problem from a mouse problem: You may see rat droppings resembling small, black capsules on countertops, floors, in cupboards, and other dark areas. While mouse droppings look like tiny black grains of rice, rat droppings are significantly thicker than mouse poop. You might hear the sound of rats moving inside the walls, chewing, squealing, and scratching. This is a sign that rats may have nested inside your walls, ceilings, or attic. The noise is generally more evident at night, as this is also when rats tend to be most active. You might also see gnaw marks in areas that rats have chewed on the structure in order to get in or to access food. Rough areas indicate new gnawing activity, whereas smooth areas are a sign that rats have been around a bit. You might also notice that stored food items such as cereals, cookies, grains, breads, and nuts have been accessed. Rats can eat through plastic bags, cardboard boxes, and even plastic containers easily. If you see gnaw marks or find holes in these containers or bags, it is best to throw them out because a rat may have been sharing your food. Perhaps the biggest confirmation of a rat problem is actually seeing a rat. As mentioned before, rats are fairly large, bulky, brownish critters with long, scaly tails. If you see one, there are most likely more as rats are social animals. What damage can rats cause? Rats are extremely destructive. Besides causing severe damage to your home's structure, rats can also eat their way through your home's wiring. This can cause a short, which could lead to a fire inside a wall. When they get in your personal items, they gnaw and chew constantly until they have destroyed everything in their path. But, the biggest concern with a rat infestation is the damage they can do to your health. Rats are carriers of a multitude of diseases from hantavirus to the bubonic plague. Any food items that rats get into have to be discarded because it's contaminated. In addition, the fleas and ticks that live on rats also carry disease that can be passed to humans and pets.
